Adverse reactions to radiographic examinations of the pediatric spine. A retrospective review was conducted of all patients at the Mayo Clinic (Rochester, MN) who received imaging studies of the spine and subsequently experienced adverse reactions to such studies. Between July of 1989 and September of 2000, 144 of 2,388 (5.9%) radiographic examinations of the spine were reported to have resulted in adverse reactions in the pediatric patients. The most common types of adverse reactions were focal musculoskeletal pain (95 children; 8.2%) and pleuroperitoneal abscess (11 children; 0.9%). These reactions occurred up to 1 month after the study in most children. The majority of these children (96%) experienced spontaneous resolution of the symptoms, and of the 5 children who did not, 4 (80%) experienced resolution within a week. There were no documented neurologic or visceral sequelae, and all children were discharged from the hospital following resolution of symptoms. The adverse reactions were not prevented by skin or airway protection. We conclude that the vast majority of patients who experience adverse reactions to radiographic examinations of the spine have a favorable prognosis.

Premier Doug Ford said Friday he plans to make changes to the Liberal government's health-care overhaul, including a change that will require the province to pass legislation to end the practice of mailing in-kind health transfers from the federal government. "We can't afford it," Ford said in an interview with The Canadian Press. "We have to take responsibility for our citizens and we've got to look after them. Right now, we're sending $21 billion a year in-kind transfers to the federal government. We're not in a position to do that." The current practice - in place since 2011 - means that everyone in Ontario, even those outside of the province, are automatically entitled to free health care. The federal government says this doesn't apply to residents of Manitoba, Nunavut and the Northwest Territories. The issue is especially important to Ontarians
