I work at a company, and we are usually approached by people who want to hire our company to do some work for them. I don't normally have anything to say about the project they propose to us, but I have recently been getting more inquiries than normal, so I have been having a difficult time responding to them all, due to the volume of the inquiries. I have had my manager look over my responses and they approve everything, but he tells me that it seems like I am not being nice to them. He wants me to inform people of my lack of availability for the project, instead of telling them no outright, to let them know that we are not able to take on more work. What is the best way to handle this? A: You have two options: Turn down all unsolicited offers. Be more specific in your communication. Tell the applicant you are happy to help them, but at this point in time, your company is understaffed, and this project would take resources from other areas of your department. I would do #2. As for saying that you are not happy to help them, you are giving them a reason to come back with a better proposal. It is also a common courtesy to let your client know that you are 4bc0debe42
