I was recently playing around with iterating through a set of data and ran into a few quirks that I was hoping someone could explain. The problem is easy to understand and replicate. This code iterates through 2 different arrays, and counts how many times 'x' is found in each. Total = 0; for ii = 1:size(myArray,2) for jj = 1:size(myArray,2) if myArray(ii,jj) == x Total = Total + 1; end end end The problem is that this is a bit slow for larger arrays. I decided to speed it up by creating an explicit vector to contain the array instead of iterating through it. Total2 = 0; fmyArray = [myArray;x]; for ii = 1:size(myArray,2) for jj = 1:size(myArray,2) if fmyArray(ii,jj) == x Total2 = Total2 + 1; end end end This works fine, but I was surprised to find that the second version has the same order of magnitude run time as the first. I understand that the vectorized version runs through the arrays faster because it is an explicit loop, however I do not see why it is faster to loop through it "the hard way". Can anyone explain why it is faster? A: It may be that the vectorized version is faster because the compiler is allowed to do some optimizations. The original approach will be slower because the jj index is not the "fastest"

Not Playstation 3. -------------------- Over the years I have done a number of little games that I wanted to share. The majority of these games are ones that I either wanted to get off my back or I just couldn't find any information on, and have no idea what their official status is. I am hoping that this can be a good alternative and put a stop to all
